By Frederic J. Haskin.

Nearly a hundred thousand women are the clerical forces which women were n the service of the United States govsome of whom fill difficult of the others are postmistresses, chiefly n small towns throughout the country. Most of the post office positions filled by women are of the fourth-class, which isolated locations which render their sional humorist regarding the meddlesome faculties of the village postmistress, few breaches of public trust are recorded against her and many instances of ravery and loyalty are in her favor. Until recently no examination has been required for fourth-class post offices, but an order issued last year by President Taft required that offices paying between $1,000 and $500 must be in charge of some one who has passed an examination for that purpose, while for those offices paying less than $500 an indorsement of qualification' must be secured from a postal inspector. This order will be modified by the Wilson administration so as o require an examination to ascertain the efficiency of every postmaster.

Notwithstanding this fact, it is also rue that there is a growing feeling in several of the departments against the employment of women, and within the last two years the percentage of appointments of women, except for special lasses of work, has been lowered. The interstate commerce commission, for instance, includes no women on its staff. While many of the chiefs of bureaus speak enthusiastically of the efficiency and faithfulness of the women who work under them, others claim that women are more apt to be unwilling to work overtime than men and are less willing o make their own plans subservient to he good of the work.
